Anthropology And Migration

Migration is the movement of people from one locality to another. Anthropology is invested in studying this phenomenon primarily but not exclusively in its cultural and social dimensions. Studies on migration in anthropology can be roughly divided into two categories. First, there are studies that emphasize the aspect of immigration. These studies focus on the way immigrants are perceived by the societies into which they enter as well as how they respond to these perceptions ...

Face aux bouleversements qu'elles ont connus au XXe siècle - le colonialisme, l'urbanisation, les migrations, les guerres - le terme d'anthropologie a souvent été abandonné au profit de celui de sociologie pour traiter de ces transformations. Quel est l'intérêt de revenir à la spécificité de la discipline anthropologique ? Ce numéro tente de répondre à cette question en explorant les différents courants de recherche anthropologiques qui ont contribué à cerner ces changements ...

I have conducted research on migration, anthropology of gender, and statelessness. I have also analyzed the migration of post-Soviet labor migrants moving between Istanbul, Moscow, and southern Moldova; the gender dynamics in migrant communities; and more recently, how noncitizen women and their children in Russia--especially migrants from Central Asia and central Africa--access service ...

Anthropology | Migration

American anthropology has a long history of scientific interest in and professional concern for immigrant populations. For example, Franz Boas, the founding father of American anthropology, wrote and spoke extensively on erroneous beliefs, anchored in pseudoscience, that immigrants in the early twentieth century from Southern and Eastern Europe were genetically inferior. A century of anthropological research on immigration and host society responses to immigration shows that immigration ...

As Michele Statz and Lauren Heidbrink put it in Migration as Clickbait (February 2018): Anthropology has failed to effectively engage in public policy. . . . It is not enough to critique the intended and unintended consequences of public policy; our response must be to harness our experiences and the expertise of the communities with which we work to address or even bypass these consequences. This includes participating in broad national networks and training in engaged public policy and ...

Mobility is foundational for the human condition. A longstanding anthropological interest in forms of migration has been complemented, in recent years, by conceptual and theoretical debates that question the naturalization of sedentariness in cross-cultural comparisons, as well as representations of non-stop mobility as a hallmark of contemporaneity.
