Credit theories of money, also called debt theories of money, are monetary economic theories concerning the relationship between credit and money. Proponents of these theories, such as Alfred Mitchell-Innes, sometimes emphasize that money and credit/debt are the same thing, seen from different points of view. Proponents assert that the essential nature of money is credit (debt), at least in ...

If a bank lends money to a consumer, this is a form of credit. The consumer is given money, which it later has to pay back to the bank. Money. Money is any item or electronic record that can be used for the purchase of goods, provide a store of account, and can be used as a medium of exchange. If you buy on a debit card, you are using actual money in your bank account. You have a certain amount, and once your bank account is depleted, you can't spend any more money. People will accept your ...
