Learning to read is complex. Children don't learn one reading-related skill and then move on to the next in a step-by-step process. Instead, they must develop competency in four areas simultaneously: word identification, comprehension, fluency, and motivation. They begin to develop these competencies by listening to books read aloud.

One of the popular reading theories is the whole-language theory. This approach suggests that if students are immersed in words, books and language-rich environments, they will naturally make meanings of words and learn to read. This theory does not utilize specific and direct literacy instruction. Whole language is a top-down theory of reading.

In this concentrated, intelligible, and useful introductory volume Stanley Porter and Jason Robinson give a splendid overview of hermeneutical and interpretive thought. Neither an all-inclusive survey that moves too quickly over the surface of complex issues nor a specialized volume on a single, narrow topic, Porter and Robinson's Hermeneutics provides critical analysis of major movements and ...
